

It was believed in the past that the dominant allele will automatically increase within a population. This is not true. According to the Hardy-Weinberg principle, allele frequencies remain in stable equilibrium in a population that is not evolving. However, under some circumstances, the allele frequencies will not remain constant from one generation to the next. Outline the factors that prevent Hardy-Weinberg equilibrium from being maintained.

